The impact of the Eurozone crisis on Turkey, Italy and the Mediterranean

The Eurozone crisis has impacted deeply upon Italy, southern Europe and the European Union as a whole. Surrounding regions have also not been immune to the crisis. The southern Mediterranean countries, whose economic problems contributed to the Arab spring, now struggle to recover in view of their dependence on Europe. Turkey instead, has maintained high levels of growth, but beneath the surface, its interdependence with the EU also casts shadows over its economic future. What precisely has been the impact of the crisis on Italy, Turkey and the Mediterranean and what are the prospects for turning the interdependence between the three into a force for the recovery of the wider Europe space?

Italy and Turkey in the Mediterranean:
Exploring joint economic and political projects in the region

Both Italy and Turkey as Mediterranean powers have an interest in the sustainable development of the region. Both have been active at the bilateral level as well as within a broader European framework. In view of the political and economic complementarities between Italy and Turkey, how could the two partners cooperate in the region? Precisely, what potential joint projects could Italy and Turkey pursue so as to contribute to the political and economic development of their shared neighbourhood?
